

Anytime, anywhere, anyhow.....

I chose the attached picture as an example of the ability to work or communicate with others from anywhere at any time, a reality that has been hugely beneficial to my own online collaboration and learning. I have worked on coursework and answered e-mails at eleven o'clock at night as well as six o'clock in the morning. Others during this program have travelled and still logged in during class times or have missed classes and caught up by watching the recordings of the class meeting. And I'll admit to 'attending' some Saturday morning sessions in the comfort of my pajamas (thank goodness for the ability to turn the camera off!).

Life no longer has to work around school, now I can fit my school work in around other things in my already busy schedule.

Learning and collaborating in an online environment means that students can attend courses (synchronously or asynchronously) to earn credits and that they can do it on their terms – wherever, whenever and however they can make it work.
